The same effect, unless modified by other circumstances, is produced when the charge is increased w1th the same weight of projectile. In this case the projectile has to traverse a greater length of bore before the same relief due to expansion is obtained. The higher pressures which consequently rule, react upon the rate of combustion of the powder, and again a somewhat higher energy is obtained.1 1 Interior Ballistics. By Colonel Pashkitvitsch. Translated from the Russian by Captain Taster H. Bliss, U. S. Army. Washington, 1892. Observed pressures in the Bores of Guns There are two methods for determining experimentally the tension of the gas at various points in the bore of a gun, both of which have been tried more or less successfully. The first method measures the tensions by means of suitable gauges inserted at different points in the walls of the bore. This method was first employed by Rodman as stated in Chapter I. By the second method the velocity of the projectile is measured at different points of the bore, and from these measured velocities the accelerations are calculated, and then the pressures, by multiplying the accelerations by the mass of the projectile. Two methods of determining these velocities have been devised: First, that employed in 1760 by Chevalier D Arcy, an account of which is given in Chapter I. Second, Nobles method, which consists in measuring the time at which the projectile...
